Adorning the Bride: Lyric and Melodic Confluence in Islamicate Musics

Where Melody Meets Mystical Poetry: the Sur Repertoire of Sindh’s Shāh ‘Abdul Latīf Bhiṭāī

The Indic term sur is widely used throughout South Asia to mean “tone,” or “note.” In the subcontinent’s northwest, however, sur holds two additional meanings, both of which are linked to the eighteenth-century Sindhi Sufi poet Shāh ‘Abdul Latīf Bhiṭāī (d. 1752): 1) melody type (akin to rāg); and 2) a section, or “chapter,” of Shāh Latīf’s poetic compendium, Shāh Jo Risālo. This paper examines the sur repertoire of Sindh, Kachchh, and western Rajasthan, in which surs act as distinct melodic vehicles for Bhiṭāī’s mystical poetry. Each section of the Risālo is composed along an allegorical or metaphorical theme, and referred to as a sur (e.g., sur Rāṇo). In textual accounts of the repertoire, the poetic content of a given sur (chapter) is said to be sung in its corresponding sur (melody type), pointing to the rootedness of poetic content within musical practice, and vice versa, as well as to linkages between melody, geography, and oral culture. Drawing on fieldwork conducted in Kachchh in the summers of 2014 and 2015, I explore the extent to which performance practices are in consonance with the textual ideal of melodic-poetic correspondence.
